Harrison Winslow , 2002-03-26 Harrison Winslow is the author of a successful media website Background: Harrison and I are both members of the UoA, and we'd been in conversation about organizing a Halloween meetup, but nothing came of it. Last week, Harrison suggested that we approach Danny Inglis to see if he would be willing to help us out with this. We both agreed that a meetup was great, but it was important for the attendees to be as cost-effective as possible. We wanted to bring lots of fun, but not have it so costly that only professional costume-makers could participate. After speaking to Danny, we decided that if everyone shared costumes, we could have a fun and cost-effective Halloween Halloween Costume Party. It would be on Halloween, and we'd probably have a significant other there dressed up. The whole point was to have fun, and to have a fun time. Here's the plan: We'd have everyone in his or her usual costume, except for one couple. We'd let them be a couple dressed up together, and tell them to be a couple whenever they're out in public. We'd have a paper bag for people to drop in $10 for a blanket or sheet, and some plastic dishes or something to put money in, since that's what most of us would be carrying. Everyone would be allowed to buy two drinks, or one drink and a candy bar. We'd have a list of the times and locations of the meetups, so that people could choose a time and place that works for them. We'd charge $20 a person (cash only), but we'd cap it at 70 or 80 people. We'd have a table with some money and the bottles of whiskey and wine that we'd be serving. And we'd do it in the City of Angels. This was the right plan, but the first problem that we had was that the group only really had a couple of Halloween costumes, and we couldn't use the old ones, since they were all pretty much the same. After a lot of discussion, we decided to 2edc1e01e8
